The United States is confronted with an array of socio-economic challenges. This lecture focuses on the impact of these challenges on American politics and public policy. Importantly, attention will be given to the declining confidence of the American people in the American political system. Concluding comments on the topic will be advanced.

The Elske V P Smith Lecturer award was established in honor of the former dean of the College of Humanities and Sciences (1980-1992). The award is given annually to an exceptionally talented faculty member nominated by colleagues.
